Trump: "I was the hunted. Now I'm the hunter."
And he's coming for you, Bibi.

Netanyahu thought he was clever. Launch the war. Trigger global chaos. Corner Trump. Force him into a no-win:
- Support Israel and betray "America First"
- Stay out, and be painted as weak or anti-Israel

But Trump isn't falling for it. He's been watching this play unfold for decades. He knows Iran doesn't have nukes. He knows Netanyahu has been lobbying for war since the early 2000s, always crying wolf. He knows Israel can't win this war alone — they'll burn through defense stockpiles in weeks.

Bibi's hunting a lifeline — a way to rally the West, to reignite the old "War on Terror" playbook, to pull America — and specifically Trump — back into the game as Israel's military guarantor.

With his political career hanging by a thread and domestic outrage boiling over, Bibi needed a reset. He needed a big enemy, a global distraction, and an excuse for indefinite emergency powers. He needed a war that would force America's hand — a war so big and destabilizing that no U.S. leader could afford to stay out.

So he lit the match.

But here's the problem: Trump isn't playing the old game. He's not Bush. Not Obama. Not Biden.

He sees the trap. He sees through the nukes narrative. He sees how Bibi's been crying "Iran" for 20 years, always five minutes from midnight. He knows that Israel's military strategy is unsustainable without American airlift, American money, and American political cover.

And that's where Bibi miscalculated.

Because this time, the cavalry isn't coming. Not unless Trump says so. And Trump? He's waiting. Letting Bibi burn through ammo, international goodwill, and global patience.

The hunter is now the one bleeding out.

And when the oxygen runs out — when the missiles stop flying because the stockpiles are empty — Bibi won't have a choice.

He'll be forced to the table. And Trump? He'll be right there waiting — not as a warmonger, but as the only man who can end the war he refused to start.

A peace deal brokered on his terms. One that keeps America out, stabilizes the region, and makes Trump look like the greatest peace advocate of our time.

"I was the hunted. Now I'm the hunter."
And the trap just snapped shut.
